Abstract Text:
Today, there is a deep appreciation that professional nurses require a personalized career development model to sustain their scholarly productivity, performance, and leadership progression. Mentoring can be used to build scholarship and leadership competence in nursing across a variety of professional and geographic landscapes. While there maybe be no consensus around the definition what constitutes good mentorship. There is no doubt that successful mentorship is vital to career success and satisfaction for both mentors and mentees. Yet challenges continue to inhibit many nurses from either experiencing or receiving effective mentorship. Given the importance of mentorship on professional development, this presentation will address how mentoring relationship may enhance nurses career, assess how different approaches impact mentoring relationships and how to evaluate strategies for a successful relationship. However, over a lifetime of career development and growth, a traditional mentor(s) may not be sufficient. Thus, there is a need to develop a circle of advisors as no single person can provide all the information, constructive criticism, emotional support and challenge all that is needed in order to have the best chance of reaching professional goals. A multiple, mosaic, or composite mentoring is a better approach as it may be more effective and efficient to seeking specific courses of actions for various problems.

Many organizations are encouraging nurse academics, researchers, and clinicians to participate in team science and interprofessional education and training opportunities to increase their scholarly competence. Also, many nurses have recognized that professional success and goal attainment has included social and intellectual support from family, friends, colleagues, and other thought leaders. These advisors can provide both professional and personal assistance. Thus, a circle of advisors is a new dimension of a successful professional career model that demonstrate how mentors are vital but it takes a village to promote the next generation of nurse leaders.
